4-3 Journal: Tester

February 2, 2023

- What elements of the user stories were the most helpful in developing your initial test cases?

  - I would say that the most important thing for me was using the original descriptions of the user stories; "As a…I want to…so that I can…". I cared less for the "who was requesting" and only paid attention to the wants and the results. I also looked at the acceptance criteria for more details on what was being requested.

- What was missing from the user stories that would have been helpful?

  - I think that more details on the specifics of what they wanted would have made it easier for me to come up with test cases. Most of the time I didn't know what or where things might be on the page. Although, it would probably be different with a "real" project, where I might at least have a wireframe of the site, if not a working product.

- How might you go about getting this additional information?

  - A quick email to the client requesting more detailed information would be the preferred source of information. The Product Owner and Scrum Master may also have some information regarding testing requirements. So I would email them first so they can ask further questions to the Client.

- Create a sample email that would effectively relate your needs and prompt a proper response. Be sure to identify the recipient of the communication and the specific information you expect to receive.

Hello Christy,

Looking at the user stories, it seems like I don't have enough details to effectively create test cases.

User Story One:

- Is an email the best way to share the User profile? Can that be shared by keeping it on the site? It would make it easier for testing and eliminating email clients from potentially being the issue, junk mail, "lost" mail, etc.

Thank you!
